The Sky is the Limit

A single parent starts an organization to assist other parents in her situation.

By Holly Clay

Being a single parent may not be an ideal situation for parents or children alike. But with the help of Camille Taylor and her organization LimitedNotInc., raising a child alone doesn't have to be as difficult as it has been proven to be in the past. Her organization is a network of single moms, dads, and parental guardians that are there to assist each other, lightening the load of rearing a child solo.

"We are a non-profit for single parents. We are also a support group," explained Taylor, a single parent of three. "We do everything we need to do together to alleviate stress that we suffer from alone. As single parents, we want to achieve things on our own, but we are focused on the things we have to do for our children. The organization helps single parents to also focus on themselves."

Besides its members drawing support from each other, they are also coached on essential topics such as healthy cooking. The organization also offers first time home buyers assistance and psychologists. The whole idea behind starting the organization was born out of Taylor's frustration of doing it all on her own and not having support.

"Being a single parent of three, it got to the point where I couldn't do it all on my own," she explained. "We are all conditioned to do things on our own, but I've found if we work together, we can make so much more happen."

As of right now, the organization is running off of donations. Yet, this has not hindered the word about the organization from spreading and reaching out to more and more single parents. Today, LimitedNotInc is not just a circle of single parents, but something more.

"We really are a family," said Taylor. "We are breaking the cycles we are subjected to. We are no longer allowing kids in single homes to fall through the cracks."
